Angel Investors & Networks (£2,000 - £10,000 Tickets)

1. SFC Capital

What it is: SEIS and EIS seed fund. States it invests £100k-£300k for 10%-20%.

How to apply: register at portal.sfccapital.com/register/startup

Requirement stated: the company must qualify for SEIS.

Address: Fox Court, 14 Grays Inn Rd, London, WC1X 8HN

Email: info@sfccapital.com

2. Angel Investment Network

What it is: an online platform where founders post a pitch to registered angels. It is not itself an investor.

How to apply: create a pitch with the online form at angelinvestmentnetwork.co.uk

Address / phone / email: none shown on its website.

3. Odin

What it is: a platform for running SPVs and angel syndicates. It is not itself an investor; it is a tool for collecting money from angels you have already found.

Hey [Name], I'm building a trading research platform based in London. Most software hides its flaws; ours is built to flag stale data and overfitting. We just proved that 12 famous strategies lost to the index. Raising a seed round right now—would love to send you the deck if you're open to it!

Hi [Name], I'm building a systematic trading platform. In our 9-year backtest of 12 strategies, buy-and-hold actually beat all of them. We built this to flag bad data, not hide it. I'm currently raising a seed round and would love to connect and share our findings.

Hey [Name]! I've been following your work. I'm currently raising a seed round for my new venture—a systematic trading research platform built on radical transparency (it caught 8 material bugs in standard trading models). Opening up early angel tickets to my network. Would love to send you our investor deck!

Subject: Seed funding round: Systematic trading research platform

Dear [Name],

I am reaching out to share an early-stage business venture I am building and to offer an investment opportunity. While we know each other personally, I want to approach this strictly as a formal business proposal.

I am currently raising a seed round for [Company Name], a systematic trading research platform. The platform is designed to rigorously test published trading strategies with radical transparency. Instead of hiding flawed results—which is common in this space—the software argues with its own conclusions by flagging stale data, mixed data, and overfitted numbers.

To give you an idea of our approach: in our recent 9-year backtest of 12 published strategies, our system proved that simply holding the index actually outperformed the strategies on absolute return. However, our system achieved roughly 60% of the maximum drawdown (meaning a significantly lower peak-to-trough fall). It is a decision-support tool built to be audited, not blindly trusted.

I am opening early angel/seed allocations with ticket sizes between £2,000 and £10,000 to my immediate network before pitching to wider institutional investors. The funding will be used to run proper walk-forward tests across different market regimes.

If this is something you might be interested in exploring, please let me know. I would be happy to send over the investor deck and the full backtest results, or schedule a brief 20-minute call to walk you through the business case.

Best regards,

Subject: Systematic trading research — our backtest lost to the index, and we can prove why

Hi [Name],

I'm building [Company Name], a systematic trading research platform. I'm raising a £1M seed round and would value 20 minutes of your time.

The short version of where we are: we tested 12 published strategies across 528 instruments over nearly nine years. Buy-and-hold beat every one of them on absolute return. Our best configuration returned about 3.5 percentage points a year less, with roughly 15 points less drawdown.

I'm leading with that because it's the first thing you'd find, and because the thing I'm actually building is the reason I know it. Most trading research can't tell you when its own data is stale, mixed, or overfitted. Ours reports all three, per number, and the limitations section of our study was written by us rather than found by a reviewer.

If a research tool that argues with its own conclusions is interesting to you, I'd like to show you what it found — including the parts that didn't work.

Would [Day] or [Day] suit for a short call?

Best,

[Your Name]
